COURSE DESCRIPTION

In their communities, social workers are in charge of several crucial duties, including overseeing residents' mental and emotional wellbeing. Students who complete a Masters of Social Work programme are competent to work in the welfare system, operate client systems, perform counselling, and more. They can also spread information about mental and emotional health. Most master's degree candidates in social work elect to focus on a particular field of the profession, such as alcohol and drug abuse, child welfare, adoption, poverty, social change, human rights, community development, sexual abuse, or international development. There may be both clinical and non-clinical applications for several of these fields. Social work is a field of study that focuses on improving people's quality of lives and society as a whole the neighbourhood. Human and community development, social policy and administration, interpersonal relationships, and the manipulation of social, political, and psychological elements are all topics covered in social work. Social work degrees incorporate theories from various other disciplines, including sociology, medicine, psychology, philosophy, politics, and economics, to provide thorough comprehension and control over any type of social mechanism.
